The Pike's Peakers

The Pike's Peakers Richard Gehling, Mary Ann Gehling

The Pike's Peakers were the fortune hunters of the late 1850's, the men and women who rushed to the Front Range of the Rockies in search of gold. Taken collectively, they were a vast throng more than 100,000 strong; taken individually, however, they were simply the colorful characters of the great Pike's Peak Gold Rush. Among their number were Hoosiers and Hawkeyes, Buckeyes, Badgers, Pennsylvania Dutch and Georgia Crackers. There were farmers in their faded jeans and slouched hats, clerks in their long-tailed blues, scolding mothers and their squalling babies, merchants, doctors, lawyers, millers, politicians, printers, bankers, and even a newspaper editor or two. A few were hometown heroes. A few more were on the run from the law. And even though the great majority could rightfully be called honest and industrious citizens, there were enough misfits among them to induce the editor of the Nebraska City News to later characterize the whole emigration as "a shiftless, lazy, lousy, scurvy, profane, insane and idiotic herd of rascallions, nincompoops and ninnies."
