Hypothermia in Neurosurgery: Symposium Organized by P. E. Maspes at the Second European Congress of Neurosurgery Rome, April 18-20, 1963 (Acta Neurochirurgica Supplement)

Hypothermia was first applied to the human in 1940 by Smith and Fay in an attempt to affect the growth of malignant tumours, and found its most important application firstly in open cardiac surgery and latterly in neurosurgery. The first results regarding the use of hypothermia in neurosurgery were reported at the First International Congress of Neurological Sciences held in Brussels in 1957. The same subject was again considered at the annual meeting of the Societe de Neurochirurgie de Langue Fran}aise held in Montpellier in 1962. When I was charged with the task of organizing the Symposium at the Second European Congress of Neurosurgery, I thought it advisable to put forward again the problem of the use of hypothermia in neurosurgery. Though this procedure had rapidly become popular and a mass of publications from the most important neurosurgical centres of the world had appeared, many problems remained unsolved, and in particular those related to the choice of cases to be treated, the usefulness of the procedure and its possible dangers.
