Jinetero: A Cuban Romance David M Hancock
An erotically-charged romance set in Havana, 1991.

Amidst the crumbling splendor and austerity of Cuba in the 1990s, a love story -- or is it just another transaction? -- boils up between an American tourist and a Cuban escort. A steamy valentine set in a backdrop of balmy breezes and hungry faces on an island frozen in a spell of political ideology.

"Jinetero: A Cuban Romance" is a realistic depiction of Castro's Cuba, down to the food lines, rampant unemployment and neighborhood spy networks. A remarkable look at the resiliency of a people who push forward under the most adverse conditions, as seen through the eyes of a young American tourist. Written by a former Miami Herald reporter.

The story of a friendship that includes a graphic sex scene.

"Jinetero: A Cuban Romance" is part of David M. Hancock's debut collection of sexy gay-themed speculative fiction "The Man Who Lost His Gayness" which will include "Jinetero" and another Kindle single, "The Night That Ronnie Fagged Out!"

Sexy speculative fiction where magic is manifest and disaster lurks in every trick gone bad. Twisted tales of the boudoir told with kind, if sharply-barbed, wit. Hard-eyed looks at the politics of desire and being free.

And don't miss the novel "Tricks Gone Bad," an erotic tapestry that begins and ends with a violent murder in the Chihuahua desert outside Ciudad Juarez. Adrenalin-soaked vignettes about lust and risk taking as a young reporter struggles against blackmailers.

From "Jinetero: A Cuban Romance"

On Saturday night, Juan takes him to a discotheque on the other side of the Malecón from his hotel. As he gets out of the cab, Donny is greeted by several teen-age girls vying for his favors. It's yet another establishment where the Cubans can't go in without a tourist on their arm.

Jineteras, says Juan gayly.

More than a few. More than two dozen, mostly girls, and so young. It makes Donny a little queasy to see these tricked-up teenagers on the make. And a few men, sexy boys who stare at him, all waiting outside the club for a tourist to take them inside.

In the club, they have a rum and coke. Donny comments on the scene outside. Juan laughs and says he is different from those jineteras.

Lo que no entra aquí, he says, pointing at his eyes, no entra aquí, he adds, pointing at his mouth.

They are there early and the club is half empty. Donny finds it a little depressing and primitive, all black paint and flashing lights and mirrors. When he goes to the men's room, he finds an L-shaped urinal lined with a back mirror from foot to waist-high. He would be able to see every dick taking a piss in this intimidating mirror; but fortunately there is just one man on the far side of the L. The man, a type of Cuban wolf so prevalent in Havana, watches in the mirror intently as Donny manages to piss. Is he a cop waiting for Donny to give one too many shakes to his wang? Or a hustler Donny could add to the mix for $20? Who can say.

Juan is proud of the discotheque in the manner of a third-world person who thinks his American visitor can only appreciate the newest technology. Donny conceals that he finds it dismal, and manages to move the evening in the direction of a walk home on the Malecón.

It is their final night together. They walk a little way and then sit on a shallow rock wall, looking across the ocean, north to America. Waves gently batter the rocks below the sea wall; a little way down, some black Cuban kids are jumping off rocks into the surf. The breeze is cool on their faces. Behind them blares the noise of the boulevard, the cars honking and pedestrians arguing.
